An Unfair Change of Rules?

Matthew was not writing about workers' rights in Matthew 20:1-16a as he addressed second and third generation of Jews in the late first century. Jews had slowly become a minority in the church that began as a completely Jewish religious movement. Since Jesus was originally regarded as a reformer of Judaism, not the founder of a new way to encounter God, non-Jewish converts were expected to embrace Judaism with its 613 laws. This was changed in the early first century: liberals like Paul of Tarsus began baptizing Gentiles without insisting that they first convert to Judaism. Gentiles appreciated this 180-degree turn, but Christians of Jewish origin had a problem that they had borne "the day's burden and the heat," circumcision and those all-pervasive Jewish regulations. To them, it was unjust.

This is when Matthew's Jesus comes to the scene. He tells the story of a landowner who pays each of his workers the same amount of money even if some worked twelve hours while others only one or two! When confronted with this unjust wage scale, the employer reminds his workers that he paid the amount they had agreed upon. Therefore, the laborers could only challenge his generosity. In other words, Christians of Jewish origin who still were obliged to follow the laws of Moses were not being treated unjustly by God. They had made that commitment at the foot of Mount Sinai 1,200 years before. God was simply being generous to Gentiles by not demanding the same commitment from them. At its core, this message, though unpleasant to some, is fundamental to our faith: God rarely works in "black or white" nor does fit into a "one size fits all" theology. This would contradict the fundamental truth of our faith: „Unity in diversity“, not „uniformity“.

When Paul first began to follow the risen Jesus, he assumed that the second coming of the Lord was just around the corner (Philippians 1:20-24, 27a). But as the years went on and Jesus' second coming was delayed, Paul was forced to admit: someone seems to have changed the rules of the game – no second coming in sight..

This is a great occasion to reflect upon how our understanding of God has changed since we first learned about God as children. Perhaps some of these changes we like while others are problematic because they make us leave the comfort zone of our childhood faith.
