Reflections on the 21st Sunday of the Year

I cannot resist the temptation to tell the story of the Scottish preacher who was going about “there will be grinding of teeth”. A lady in the congregation is supposed to have said loudly – “let ‘em grind ‘em as ‘as ‘em” in other words, only those who have teeth will be able to grind them. The preacher was not to be outdone – “Madam, teeth will be provided”.

The message I take from today's gospel is that there is no room for mediocrity in being a Christian – Jesus demands from us a total commitment to his way, which can at times seem a very narrow way.

We all value our freedom; we live in a country where there is democracy, where our governments are elected by the people, where our human rights are protected. But true freedom does not mean we can choose to do right or to do wrong, rather true freedom means we must choose to do what is right.

Many years ago, I was faced with a situation where I knew the Lord was calling me in a certain direction. I was reluctant to follow his call because I was afraid, among other things, that I would distance myself from the priest who was my superior at the time. Eventually I gave into the Lord, and because I used my freedom rightly, in a strange and unexpected way, I became more free. The problem with my superior was solved in an unexpected way – after a couple of weeks he was found dead in bed one Sunday morning.

Society today would encourage us to be mediocre Christians – it would say “in our modern society, to be a totally committed Christian is just not on – God will understand if we don't toe the line completely”. But there are places in the Scriptures where such mediocrity is condemned more than outright rebellion.

But don't forget – Jesus is with us as we try to follow him – he comes to us in the sacraments, particularly Holy Communion, and in the many incidental graces we are offered every day; we are not alone, we can call on him at any time.
